Classified according to the purposes they serve, the functions are neatly stacked in categories and placed in relevant menus, so with a couple of clicks you can get to the ones you need. The workspace is divided into several parts and most of the space in the main window is assigned to the translation area, where the source and the target languages share similar panes. The 'Project Explorer' pane contains the files that were included in the currently open translation project. Powerful translation features and multiple reviewing tools When starting a new project in Déjà Vu it is possible to use templates and creating them takes a single click. More precisely, you will be able to save any of your projects as templates and use their settings as a model when dealing with a similar task. Creating a lexicon from an opened document can also be done and this way you will have at your disposal all the words inside that file, ordered according to the frequency with which they occur in the text. Prior to saving and exporting the translation, you can check the document, using the functions available under the 'Review' menu. This way, you can verify the spelling and the terminology, check tags and spaces, edit comments and many more. The feature set is huge, and most of it is very simple. In fact, it is possible to design your own garden: every plant has its own properties, growing time, and so on. This system also allows you to choose between a simulated live version of the plants, and a virtual version. The Live version is a bit more difficult to manage, because it has to simulate that behaviour, even if the user sometimes prefers another solution. After setting it up, you can start designing your own garden. At this point, you will have to create groups of plants. For example, you can divide the plants into groups according to the basic appearance. For instance, you can create a group of flowers, a group of veggies, a group of plants which need irrigation, a group of trees, a group of deciduous plants, a group of herbs, and so on. After creating those groups, you have to put plants inside them. Each group allows you to choose the number of plants inside. After making those choices, it is possible to set the size of the plants, their arrangement, and many more. You can set the planting height, and the illumination, among others. With that done, it is possible to simulate the germination process. Plants have different seeds, and they have to be planted sequentially.
