While this option is easy to use and may actually work, it is still an option. What we are talking about today is a much better option. What is this “magic” option? Radiofrequency ablation. Radiofrequency ablation is a therapy that is basically the same as it’s cousin, radiofrequency treatment. What is radiofrequency? Ask your doctor for a referral to a pain management center that specializes in RF treatments. The main differences are how the two therapies are used and where the application is done. RF ablation has a variety of benefits that do not exist in RF alone. How Is RF Ablation Used? When RF ablation is used in the spine, it is done to kill tumor cells that are responsible for pain. Radiofrequency treatment is used to kill these cells. The patient is placed in a specialized machine that allows for the RF current to be applied to the right part of the body and, at the same time, is monitored by a diagnostic machine to ensure the ablation is being directed to the right part of the body. RF ablation is often used for pain in the spine, tumor destruction, and sympathetically mediated pain. Why Is RF Ablation So Effective? The most likely explanation for why RF ablation is so effective is because it is a focused energy that is applied at the correct part of the body. RF causes very localized tissue destruction. While RF alone will not easily destroy the cancer, when used in conjunction with other pain medications, the ablation can be applied as the main treatment therapy. RF when used on cancer is considered a “minimally invasive” form of surgery. It is estimated that about 90% of patients are cured of their cancer with just one or two treatments. In most situations, pain medicine is added with the RF to treat the pain that is not responsive to the RF alone. The RF can be applied 3da54e8ca3
