Microsoft said to be working on new Surface for the enterprise market An image from Microsoft's website shows a tablet running Windows 10. (Microsoft) Microsoft may be working on a Surface device for the enterprise market. Business Insider revealed this week the company was working on a Surface device running Windows 10, as well as a second "Surface for the enterprise." A Microsoft spokesperson told Business Insider that the company is "looking at building new products, as well as upgrading existing devices." This suggests that Surface-branded devices could be a thing of the past. The spokesperson wouldn't comment on whether Microsoft was working on new Surface devices, but did add: "The volume shipments we are reporting are for shipments to customers." The "Second Surface for the Enterprise" could be one of Microsoft's existing Surface tablets or a brand new device. Microsoft's data protection rules may also be to blame for the development of Surface for the enterprise. The Surface enterprise-focused tablet is expected to use a special edition of Windows 10, which is separate from the standard version of the OS that is available to the public. Microsoft doesn't seem to be ruling out the possibility that Surface-branded devices could be for sale again at some point in the future. Microsoft's tablet strategy is in chaos. In October, Microsoft said that Surface 2 and Surface Pro 2 devices would be

Remote PTFE composite membrane cryocanalization in the treatment of inferior vena cava thrombosis: A case report. Vena cava thrombosis is a rare condition with a high mortality rate if left untreated. Its etiology is usually secondary to deep venous thrombosis or can be idiopathic. Treatment is based on anticoagulation or thrombolysis and, in the most severe cases, surgical thrombectomy. Immediate surgical thrombectomy is considered to be the best option to obtain secondary thrombolysis with the advantage of eliminating thromboembolic propagation. Endovascular approaches are usually indicated when surgery is contraindicated. Although anticoagulants are considered the primary therapy, in some cases their use may be contraindicated and can be life-threatening for the patient. In these cases, thrombolysis is the treatment of choice. Catheter-directed thrombolysis or clot fragmentation, either with rt-PA alone or in combination with urokinase, is an accepted approach to the management of iliofemoral deep venous thrombosis. Another option for the treatment of deep venous thrombosis is direct thrombolysis with aurokinase or tissue-type plasminogen activator (t-PA). The solvent dilution technique in which an external device is placed into the thrombus and cryogenic ultrasound is used as a tool for lytic activity has been explored by some authors in the treatment of thrombosed vessels. In this report, we describe the case of a patient with inoperable thrombosed vena cava and a contraindication to anticoagulant therapy who was successfully treated with a cryotome catheter.
