A new report has estimated that the planned Legacy Way project would have an economic impact of $9.6 billion over a 50-year period, generating $1.1 billion in direct revenues and $7.2 billion in labor income. Led by University of Virginia's Virginia Tech Transportation Institute, the report was commissioned by the Richmond-based Department of Rail & Public Transportation. It finds that Legacy Way would have a total economic impact of more than $13 billion over the same 50-year period. While the plan calls for the Virginia Department of Rail & Public Transportation to cover the entire cost of the project, taxpayers would ultimately pay $3.2 billion, $1.9 billion of which would be from a variety of federal, state and local funds and public private partnerships. Those federal grants would come from the U.S. Transportation Department's New Starts program and federal funding for TIGER, which provides grants for
