"For the new motion capture technology to be accurate, it has to be set up and activated by real players," said Lee Johnson, FIFA Lead Gameplay Designer at EA SPORTS. "Real players have feedback in the form of pain and fatigue. We have used this feedback and created HyperMotion Technology in FIFA, which can help players feel and control their actions in the virtual pitch." HyperMotion Technology is an important addition to the already award-winning gameplay of FIFA 20 that delivers a deeper, more authentic and responsive experience. Together, the two games offer more ways to play and offer players more ways to enjoy the perfect football. "We are always looking for more ways to create the best sports game on the planet, and this new motion capture technology adds to the realism of play," said SVP of FIFA Studios EA SPORTS, Matt Bilbey, "Bringing a true simulation of player feedback to the new players in the game will result in a deeper more authentic football experience for players." Developed by EA SPORTS' internal soccer, gameplay and animation development teams, the new motion capture technology is also a key addition to the popular FIFA Ultimate Team mode for the Xbox One and PlayStation 4. The new technology is part of a larger change at EA SPORTS in anticipation of the FIFA World Cup Brazil™ where the team will feature three distinct play styles, and allow players to play in any of the three sets of boots used during the tournament. This includes the Adidas and Puma boots, historically seen on the Brazilian national team, as well as the Nike boots, traditionally used on the Brazilian club teams. Exclusive to the FIFA franchise, the FIFA World Cup Brazil™ boots give players the ability to play in any of the boots used during this year's tournament. Each boot features a unique set of replicas and different textures, to give players the greatest authentic FIFA World Cup experience. We will reveal more information on how these boots can be used for players in the upcoming weeks. Fans can learn more about the FIFA World Cup Brazil™ boots in the weeks to come. To be among the first to learn more about the boots, keep up with all the latest content from FIFA on Twitter, Facebook, and YouTube.Kathleen D. Ryan Kathleen D.
