Teresus Teresus (;, Téresos; Ancient Greek: Τέρεσος; Turkish: Terebos) was a small town of ancient Caria, on the coast of the bay between two ports Syme and Mytilene, but now it is part of Bodrum city. It was an important commercial centre of ancient Caria, and in the course of Hellenistic times and Roman rule, it became an important seaport. History The city is mentioned by Aristotle in his Politics (13, 13). It was a member of the Delian League since c. 550 BCE, when it sent a contingent of three ships to the naval victory of Admiral Leosthenes over the Spartans (390 BCE). Little is known about its early history. Plutarch (Pelopidas 42) says that after the Ionian revolt Teresus was one of the cities most favourable to the Spartans. Here, according to Plutarch, Pyrrhus laid siege to the city in 280 BCE, with his wife, the king's sisters, and the rest of his troops, but abandoned it soon after. He was reproached for this by Alcibiades, who led the relief force of Ephesus, and who had in fact seized the city from the Carians, not the Spartans. The city was for a time in the possession of Philip V of Macedon, and during the Classical period took a prominent part in the affairs of Caria. A people of Teresus was mentioned in the siege of Miletus by Xerxes I at the head of an army of Ionians in 480 BCE. In c. 485, it was besieged by an army led by Timocrates the general of Thrasyllus the Spartan, in the course of which a truce was made, and the garrison sent out, on which the leaders of the siege withdrew to Arcadian Leuconia (Apollonia). In 474 BCE, a combined fleet of the Persian and Persian-Ionian forces led by Artaphernes succeeded in conquering the city, and the people of Teresus, like those of Sidon, in sending over their families to the mother cities, and received with distinction high Persian appointments. In 458 BCE, the people of Teresus sent a delegation to Athens to request the construction of a wall at their expense. The foundation of
