Q: Updating an existing Markdown document Using a web-service to generate large markdown documents, I would like to update a (possibly non-existing) section of the document (i.e. I want to give advice to say a coworker, and so I want to add a comment to his/her section). When trying to access the doc, I get an "Oops, something went wrong, please try again later." What is the simplest way to do this? A: Here's a technique based on Dan Abramov's (the original author of Markdown) Python library. I've added comments for clarification. I assume that you have access to the url of the markdown file (or at least the url of the result you get in your browser when you access that markdown file directly). Start the Markdown library with this command: `ipython qtconsole --pylab` Create an empty file called "conf.py" in the same folder as your markdown file. Use the library's CLI interface with these commands: `ipython cli --help` `ipython cli run --help` The first will list a bunch of handy functions and arguments, the second one will open a tab with whatever you type here. You'll see that the markdown file has been loaded as a string in the "source" variable. Now you can do this: `Opens a tab with the markdown string.` You can modify your code. All non-exported variables and functions will be loaded into your current shell. Repeat to do the same with every part of your code. When you're done, save the file and exit. You can reopen it, and it will redo everything you did (including the imports).

The Right Way to Measure Mobile Traffic Quality: A Case Study

WHAT WE FOUND Mobile traffic continues to increase in volume at a rapid rate, with an estimated 12.5 billion mobile page views worldwide by 2015. In order to effectively measure and manage the increasing volume of mobile visitors, it's important to use a reliable and validated source for mobile traffic quality. The mobile marketing industry has long relied upon anecdotal evidence for mobile traffic quality. For example, people in the industry refer to mobile ad click-through and conversion rates that were high (of 50-70 percent) in the early days of the mobile space, but quickly fell to 10-20 percent. However, there was no scientific data to support that claim. The mobile ecosystem itself has grown into a sophisticated operation where there's little left to chance. Therefore, a few years ago, KNOOP started tracking mobile traffic quality, using a reliable and validated source for mobile traffic measurement: the Google Display Network (GDN). For this study, we analyzed a total of 8 billion mobile page views sourced via the GDN. Our research revealed that most mobile traffic quality came from high value devices. For the study, we analyzed a total of 8 billion mobile page views sourced via the Google Display Network.

OUR MAIN FINDINGS In terms of revenue share for mobile traffic, we found that: Four percent of the total mobile revenue is already generated by mobile ads running on the mobile web. Two percent of the total mobile revenue is attributable to mobile ads run within mobile apps. Five percent of the total mobile revenue comes from mobile apps. The biggest growth will occur in mobile apps. Given that the majority of mobile user traffic comes from high value devices, we believe that mobile revenue share will continue to increase over time.

HOW WE METHODODOLOGICALLY MADE THE FINDINGS We performed this study by using the Google Display Network as our source of mobile traffic data. The GDN is a list of URLs on the Internet that were accessible to users via a Google Search or Gmail message. Mobile pages represent 0.73 percent of the entire Google Display Network. Out of this percentage, 23.35 percent is attributable to mobile. In other words, on average, about 1.3 percent of mobile traffic comes from mobile web pages. The total number of mobile traffic per week was 74.48 billion visits.
