Dinosaur AIThe bright flare is an area in the sky that's produced when nearby stars explode. Known as supernovae, these stellar events can be far more energetic than ordinary novas (a type of variable star). The star explosion is so bright that it outshines many galaxies. So what's the cause? Supernovae occur when massive stars -- stars that have accumulated lots of mass through fusion -- eventually grow so large that the fusion process runs out of energy. As the star runs out of fuel, the outward push of its outer layers causes the star to implode and explode. Although a single supernova is usually enough to destroy a star, if a lot of stars go supernova at the same time, an enormous explosion of energy occurs. The energy is produced by gravitational waves, which in turn produce a bright flash. The shock wave from the explosion breaks up the material around the star, and produces the expanding shell of glowing gas that astronomers call a nebula. The key to determining the identity of supernovae lies in the types of stars that produce them. In particular, astronomers identify core-collapse supernovae -- those that originate in massive stars. There are four main categories of core-collapse supernovae: Type 1, Type 2, Type 3, and Type Ib/c. (See a table of the different types here.) Type 1 Supernovae (Type 1a and Type 1b) Type 1a Supernovae are believed to occur when a star's core is at the moment of maximum expansion and has a mass of about 10 solar masses. This is known as a Wolf-Rayet star, and such stars emit strong UV radiation. When the star collapses on itself, its fusion energy is so great that the star's surface is ripped apart, producing the expanding shell of gas. As the gas expands, it becomes bright, and the visible wavelength peaks between 400 to 700 nanometers, hence the name Type 1a. Type 1b Supernovae (Type 1b) Type 1b Supernovae are very similar to Type 1a supernovae, except they occur when the stellar core is at the end of the star's life cycle and the star is already too

The apprentice is an unusual character position in that it is one of the two with a fixed set of skills to start with, and not all of them before you're allowed a level up. They start with either Conjunction (curses/poisons) or Destruction (fireballs/conjures), and can only use one for a given encounter. The order in which they are chosen is dependent on their starting level. There is no way for them to change which they take, although they are not limited to those skills; you could put in a wandering monster for a summoning (but why would you?) and a boring archwizard for a disenchant (but why would you?) by playing different characters. By the time you have your fourth level with this character, they should be able to take each skill from each category without difficulty. That does sound a bit restrictive, and in some environments it may be an issue (especially if one becomes so desperate as to fill out a divine template to allow taking the Summon Monster or Summon Animal skills). However, given that this is a fast-paced game and we play in a variety of different scenarios, it isn't going to be an issue in most groups. I expect it will take you a few runs to get used to the rules, and I'll be asking you to do that first in your games - if you have any reservations about this approach, no one's going to be too disappointed. It's a fair few levels' worth of work to get the person who starts the campaign playing before you have the full experience of their potential, and that's a real drag. What to expect I've tried to make them as basic as possible, with the aim of giving players the option of, if they like their character, picking skills up as they go along, but without making it absolutely impossible for them to do so if they want to. You probably won't have taken acid more than a couple of times by the end of level nine, so the suggestions above about dropping Acid Dreams and Intoxication at level one are doubly valid, and you can add them if you start off really struggling. It also means that no-one starts with a paladin weapon, and there's barely any reference to the Paladin Oath. Their class back story is that they got into the School of Conjunction (by accident) or Destruction

Kingdom's Life is an Open-World Action RPG focused on political economy and social philosophy. Our goal is to increase your ability to influence and debate the political and social issues of our world, and to instill in you an enthusiasm for idealism and action. Features: Every act in the game - from building a future district, to promoting a passing legislation, to overthrowing an enemy government - can be affected by your personal achievements. This holds the key to your progression in the game, and it also allows each act to have different "feelings", based on each character's personality and ambitions. You will be able to choose your attitude to "life" and "progress" at each act's beginning, your choices and choices' rewards affecting not only your "Rising" level, but also your character's looks, and your companions' appearances and opinions towards you. A gripping and engaging story The KINGDOM'S LIFE story begins in a far future, where the space-time is in a bit of a limbo. This means that alien invaders are still on their way, and humanity is being rapidly attacked. The player will be forced to take a leading role in several major events of the history of the world, with his or her personal goals and philosophies leading the way. Little is known, however, of what will happen to the world. Open-world game with a vast amount of content: 15 districts with events and quests, 1-4 unlockable planes (depending on if you choose to have a female or male companion), numerous "random events" and famous historical characters inhabiting the world (Alcott, Uncle Sam, Victor Hugo, etc.), etc. An engaging open-world game: Enjoy a new level of freedom of movement and interaction thanks to the advanced use of the "Overdrinking" and "Controls" features, which are unique to Kingdom's Life. Players will be able to interact with their companions in the game by using the emoticon chat, and will be able to effectuate the "feelings" of their companions by using the "Goals" feature. More on this later! "Feeling" the main hero's "life" Kingdom's Life started as a social action RPG with a story focused on everyday life. While the game started with the main character's life, it has since evolved into something far more universal, and its storyline has become our interpretation of life itself, telling the story of the boundaries
