Field of the Invention This invention relates to the field of data processing systems. Specifically, the invention relates to the configuring and operation of disks within data processing systems. 2. Description of the Prior Art Disk drives comprise one type of data storage devices. Disk drives comprise a plurality of disks coaxially mounted on a common spindle, and the disks have data storage regions thereon. Heads move radially to access the data on the disks. The heads typically have, at the forward end thereof, a transducer and a slider. The transducer is configured to convert data into a form suitable for transmission across the disk and the slider has a surface at the forward end thereof. The slider design is such that the air flows over the surface of the slider, and the disk rotates allowing the slider to fly, so that the air flow causes the slider to have a lift, and the data on the disk are thus accessible by the head. The slider may also be configured to minimize any impact of the head with the disk as the slider flies. It is important to be able to identify and recognize at which position of the disk a particular physical location is located. This is normally achieved by providing a circular track including a plurality of concentric tracks, with a particular circular track being associated with a particular physical location, and data on the disk being stored on
