The concept of “HyperMotion Technology” is about making players’ actions feel more realistic, making them look more dynamic and more easy to control. It does this by pulling movement data from 22 real-life players playing a complete, high-intensity football match in motion capture suits and using this data to power the in-game systems. In short, FIFA 22 brings more authenticity to the way that players move around the pitch and make their actions feel more realistic. The in-game results are based on a combination of data from 22 real-life players that has never been used in a video game before. FIFA 22-HyperMotion Technology: what’s it all mean? 7 DIFFERENT GAMEPLAY FEATURES ADVANCED PLAYER EXPERIENCE At the heart of this technology are a series of gameplay enhancements that bring more authenticity to the way that players move around the pitch and make their actions feel more realistic. It does this by pulling movement data from 22 real-life players that has never been used in a video game before. In-game improvements follow the same general recipe: - Player Paths are more realistic and more responsive. A better “ball sense” is applied that better understands the player’s movements as they pass the ball. The interaction between players and the ball is more consistent, which means players pass with greater accuracy. There are also “lurking” elements on the pitch that react better to player behaviour, such as the goalkeeper’s behaviour in moving out of the way. - Dribbling and shooting have been improved, and have been made easier to control with increased accuracy and greater creativity. Take-ons are more fluent and more realistic, with players more able to freely dribble the ball. Defenders stand up more quickly and players are no longer too easy to bypass, so passing is more important in attack. It means dribbling is more efficient and players are better at using space around them. Lateral runs and chipped passes are more accurate. The work rate of players has been increased, so players move at a faster pace and in-game fatigue is more accurately represented. - Player ratings have been further refined to make them more reliable. The rating system now makes use of a series of ratings for each player that is calculated based on his performance throughout the season, and he gets several
