Inertia-induced bifurcation of a falling drop. We report a study of the drop dynamics of a falling half-sphere under the influence of external gravity. We observe the presence of a bifurcation of the motion of the droplet, occurring under fixed parameters and which is not located on any geometrical singular point (such as the vertex of the drop). The bifurcation leads to the coexistence of two unstable motion modes. The one of lower energy is produced by the destabilization of the vertex. The resulting regularized motion leads to partial retraction of the drop front.

The larger mode has a horizontal extent bigger than the drop and is of lower energy. It results from a linear instability that triggers a net increase in the horizontal motion of the vertex of the drop. We propose a physical interpretation of these observations in the framework of dynamics of a three-phase contact line. The approaches described in this section are approaches that could be pursued, but not necessarily approaches that have been previously conceived or pursued.

Therefore, unless otherwise indicated, it should not be assumed that any of the approaches described in this section qualify as prior art merely by virtue of their inclusion in this section. The rapid adoption of smart phones in recent years has led to an explosion in digital cameras available in the market. Most manufacturers and retailers now offer a variety of smart phone-compatible digital cameras in their online and brick and mortar stores. A consumer may purchase a smart phone-compatible digital camera for use with the smart phone, and the consumer may desire to retain control of the digital camera by syncing the digital camera with the smart phone. In one approach, a manufacturer of a digital camera may not allow the digital camera to be synced with the smart phone because the manufacturer of the digital camera may desire to retain control over the digital camera and thus may not allow the digital camera to be synced with the smart phone. In another approach, the manufacturer of a digital camera may allow the digital camera to be synced with the smart phone. However, the manufacturer may only allow the digital camera to be synced with the smart phone if the digital camera is a certain brand of the digital
